expect pirates to jump out or alligators.”
Shadden said Caddo “definitely” has appeal for more than photographers.
“The nature and the wildlife out there, you see and just marvel at what the Good Lord has given us,” Shadden said. “I think it will lower your blood pressure ten points just by being out there.”
“It might even be better without a camera in your hand,” Hackler said. “You might be better able to focus. I come home all the time and look at photos and see things that I didn’t know that I had.”
When asked what areas of the lake they preferred, Miller picked Government Ditch and the area near Uncertain. Shadden likes the Texas side with more trees. Hackler enjoys Taylor Island, as well as the Wildlife Management area.
GATOR BAIT
Each photographer found their own favorite Caddo moment – two involved alligator encounters.
“We had a husband and wife team of professional photographers out with us,” Miller said. “We were in Government Ditch and they asked if we ever saw alligators. I was telling them that it was very rare and all of a sudden – ALLIGATOR. There was an alligator right there.”
Shadden recalled taking two other photographers out in a Go Devil boat with Johnson Ranch’s Billy Carter at the helm.
“Billy asked us what we wanted to see. We said, can you put us on an alligator? We took off across the lake at full blast. He yells at us to get our cameras ready. He turns right and right there was a 12-foot alligator. We got some great pictures.”
Hackler said memories of Caddo go back to her childhood.
“We would go camping at Caddo,” Hackler said. “It’s where I did my first tent camping, my first hiking, my first fishing. It’s sacred ground to me. Has been forever and always will be.”
None reported a dangerous or bad experience on the lake, but Hackler offered one word of caution.
“Anyone who has been out on Caddo on any worthwhile trip has been lost,” Hackler said. “That can be a little bit scary, but you haven’t really experienced Caddo Lake unless you’ve been a little bit lost.”

Fans of CBS Sunday Morning say the nature moment at the end of the broadcast can provide tranquility. All three say they can find a sense of peace on Caddo.
“When you are out in nature like that, there is something very spiritual,” Miller said. “In the video I called it a church. It is a church of nature, not brick and mortar.”
Shadden said he enjoys shutting off the motor to his boat and “just listen to birds and the sounds of nature.”
Hackler said she finds a sense of peace on Caddo. “I think it has to do with the history,” she said. “It is ancient.”
Paradoxically, Caddo also provides excitement for photographers.
“Not much boring about Caddo,” Miller said. “I find Caddo exciting. Big trees, flowers, dragonflies. Always something there.”
“To me Caddo is exciting,” Shadden said. “I’ve never been bored out there.”
“You can’t see something like that somewhere else in the world,” Hackler said. “Caddo has never disappointed me.”
PHOTO TIPS
If you are headed to Caddo with only your cell phone, Miller, Shadden and Hackler say you can still take some great pictures.
“Phones today are incredible,” Miller said. “If you do it right, they can make incredible photographs. Depends where you are. If you are under a tree, sometimes looking up the tree can make a good photograph.”
Miller had one tip for amateur shooters.
“So many people when they take the picture, they hit it hard,” Miller said. “I see so many photographs that come out blurry. Be real gentle when you push the button on your phone.”
“Cell phones are getting lot better pictures,” Shadden said. “I have seen beautiful pictures shot with cell phones. It’s easy to get a good landscape with the cypress trees and everything. Just open your eyes and see the beauty and capture it.”
“I’ve only had my good camera for six or seven months,” Hackler said. “Before that everything I shot was with my iPhone. You are not going to get the woodpecker up in the tree, but you can certainly get the sunlight glinting off the water and reflecting off the trunks of the trees.”

appears to come from the dial of a transistor radio that I am listening to. I recognize the olive drab t-shirt and boonie cap.
“I know where I am,” I tell him without prompting. “It’s Vietnam and it’s about 3 in the morning. I’m in the back of an armored personnel carrier in a rice paddy listening to Super Bowl V. That’s when the Cowboys lost to Baltimore.”
“We have one more stop,” Coach replied.
The large domed stadium is filled to the rafters. The atmosphere is electric. It could only be one place and time. Soon I find Blake and myself.
“We’re at the Georgia Dome for Super Bowl XXVIII. It’s the only Super Bowl that I actually attended.”
A chill wind whistled around me as we flew through the night.
“I get the picture, Coach. The Super Bowl is more important to me than I thought.”
“You may have been the slowest lineman we had, Bobby, but at least your porch light could come on.”
“Thanks, Coach, and thanks for telling Dad that you thought I could tough it out at A&M and the Corps.”
“That’s not what I said. I told him I thought you were too dumb to quit, but maybe it’s the same thing.”
“Coach?”
“Yes.”
“If this works like ‘A Christmas Carol,’ I have to see two more ghosts tonight.”
“So?”
“I realize this sounds rude, but I’d kind of like to chat with the ghost of Super Bowl Present in time to make a certain phone call before the game.”
