telephoned complaint. When allegations involving Griffin surfaced in Walker's interviews, the principal turned matters over to Jefferson ISD Police Chief Shawn Cox.

Barnwell noted the investigation is continuing and the possibility of additional charges exists.

In addition to sexual intercourse or contact, misconduct can also include text messages or email of a sexually suggestive nature as well as a message to arrange a liaison.

Parents of students on the trip say a male chaperone also accompanied the group.

Cox refuses to divulge the name of the male chaperone or give details of what may have happened on the trip or what prompted the charges against Griffin, saying that it was still part of an ongoing investigation.

In the 2017 case of Wesley Dawn Lawless, the former teacher plead guilty to having a sexual affair with a student in her Vocational Agriculture class.

Morals and Ethics

Barnwell thinks negative influences in society impact the academic world.

"I believe there was a time in this country when morals and ethics and the character of a person were valued at a higher level than it is now," Barnwell said. "Nowadays, it's common to see nudity, sexual situations, perversion, horrific violence, pitiful language, and just about anything else on television."

In addition to TV, other technology (internet, social media, etc.) has created easy opportunities for people to see or read things that were considered taboo in the past.

Another factor impacting society also concerns the superintendent. "I also believe there are more and more kids growing up in dysfunctional homes. There are more and more kids who are abused, or neglected, or who are living with people doing drugs or perverted things," Barnwell said. "I believe strong, functional, loving homes/families to be the backbone of our society. The fewer of those, the worse off our society becomes."

Exits and Misfires

Some have questioned if adequate help is available for an educator about to make a life-changing mistake. Writing in "Psychology Today" Nick Luxmoore, lamented the lack of assistance available for a teacher drawn to an inappropriate relationship.

"As parent-figures, teachers often end up similarly confused, scared, and thinking, 'I shouldn't be having these feelings.' 'They're wrong! I must be a bad person!' Important relationships with students are sometimes curtailed because the teacher gets frightened and - crucially - is unable to ask for support from other professionals for fear of sounding perverse and unprofessional," Luxmoore stated. "The student is left in emotional limbo."

Another facet of sexual misconduct allegations is that not every one of them is true, but they can still ruin careers and lives.

"Other than parents, no other group of people is accused of child abuse and molestation more often than school employees," Dave Arnold, writing in NEA magazine, asserted. "And I do stress the word 'accused.' Fortunately for all involved, the majority of accusations are false.

Derogatory appellations, whether justified or not, can linger.

"Still, once someone has pointed their finger at you as a molester, the label is hard to shake," Arnold wrote "You have been branded, it seems, and no matter if proven innocent the public will remember the accusation. This is why school employees should take precautions against improper conduct with students, and defend themselves with no reserve against false charges."

Barnwell said he, too, has heard stories of educators who are wrongfully accused and understands the difficulty they face.

"I don't have any personal knowledge of those instances," Barnwell said, "but I have heard of some horror stories of false statements and allegations," Barnwell said. "The sad thing is whether a statement or allegation is true or not, things must be investigated thoroughly. A person who is falsely accused must basically defend themselves to prove their innocence. It's like they are guilty until proven otherwise.

"I know this has caused some serious repercussions for innocent folks," Barnwell continued. "I believe if anyone is found to have brought forth any false allegations towards an innocent person, then they should face the most severe penalties allowed by law."

Barnwell expects the struggle to continue.

"We need to help victims. We need to prosecute wrong-doers," Barnwell said.
